

Should authors use very long and complicated sentences?

for paper, the authors write

The primary aims of such research work are to estimate and get the answer of whether asset tangibility influences corporate cash holdings & investment policies of the corporate sector, whether asset intangibility impacts corporate cash holding & investment policies of the corporate sector, the financial development moderate's relation between, asset tangibility & corporate cash holdings of the corporate sector, and the financial development moderate's relation between, asset tangibility & investment policies of the corporate sector.

This is a very long sentence and very difficult for readers to understand.

Except the authors' writing is excellent, we will suggest the authors use shorter and simpler sentences.

For example, in this sentence, readers may believe that it is the same as the following

The primary aims of such research work are to estimate and get the answers of

- a) whether asset tangibility influences both corporate cash holdings and investment policies of the corporate sector,
- b) whether asset intangibility impacts both corporate cash holding and investment policies of the corporate sector,
- c) the financial development moderate's relation between, asset tangibility & corporate cash holdings of the corporate sector, and
- d) the financial development moderate's relation between asset tangibility and investment policies of the corporate sector.

If this is what the authors want to say, then it is better to write it as

The primary aims of such research work are to estimate and get the answers of

- a) whether asset tangibility influences both corporate cash holdings and investment policies of the corporate sector,
- b) whether asset intangibility impacts both corporate cash holding and investment policies of the corporate sector,
- c) whether the financial development has any moderation relationships with both asset tangibility and corporate cash holdings of the corporate sector, and
- d) whether there is any moderation relationship between asset tangibility and investment policies of the corporate sector.

This is still no good. thus, I suggest the authors use shorter and simpler sentences not only to rewrite this sentence but also to rewrite all very complicated sentences in their paper.
